

Methodology of Linguistic Research – Conclusions and perspectives

Friday March 19th, 2010

9 a.m. – 4 p.m.

Teachers: Tore Kristiansen and Pia Quist

Department of Scandinavian Research and the LANCHART Centre, Copenhagen University

The final day we will jointly try to sum up and discuss how the presented approaches differ – in their basic assumptions about language and communication, in their research interests, and hence in their methods.

A general issue that should be included in the final discussions concern the ethical worries that our research often give rise to.

It seems important to consider whether and how different approaches may learn from each other. We will again, like on the first day of the course, try to combine the general with the specific in the sense that you as participating students will be asked to assess whether your own work in any sense might benefit from what you have witnessed during the course. If no, why not? If yes, how?
